

This main issues with this paper were only minor and superficial. There were several spelling, grammatical, and MLA formatting errors. As this was only an annotated bibliography, there wasn't too much beyond those areas that I needed to change.

One major citation problem had to do with the ordering of my sources. I rearranged my sources to appear in alphabetical order, so as to adhere to MLA standards. The other change that I made with my sources was removing John Swales' The Concept of Discourse Community. The professor explicitly forbade us from using this text as a source in the annotated bibliography as we were expected to use this no matter what. I replaced it with James Porter's Intertextuality and the Discourse Community because there were several ideas and quotes that I wanted to place in my revised paper 4 draft.

This paper gave me experience with researching primary and secondary sources. It provided me with an understanding of how one might propose research on a specific topics, whether it pertains to writing or not. It was surprisingly straightforward to write once I had a good idea of the research area I wanted to focus on.
